The effect of recombinant bovine somatotropin (bST) treatment on energy intake and body condition was investigated in 80 cows kept in large loose-housing barns on a commercial farm. Forty cows were treated with bST (500 microg) daily for 18 weeks from 1 January to 31 March. The other 40 cows were a control group treated with an equivalent volume of saline and untreated for the same period. Treatment with bST increased milk yield by 27% but had no significant effect on milk fat concentration. There was no effect of treatment on energy intake (assessed using individual feeding records or total feeding observations), body condition or body weight at time of slaughter. Mean body weights during the feeding season were similar for treated and control cows. The results indicate that treatment with bST at 500 microg daily had no significant effect on energy intake or body condition in dairy cows kept in a large loose-housing barn.
